Category:Computing softwareIn general, the present invention relates to a drawer slide. More particularly, the present invention relates to a slide rail and a drawer with more compact structure. A typical slide rail includes a slide rail body having an L-shaped front section and an L-shaped rear section interconnecting a pair of side plates, to form a U-shaped structure. The side plates include a U-shaped groove at their inner surfaces, and the front section and the rear section of the slide rail body each includes a projection, which is inserted into the groove when assembled to the side plates. The projection of the front section interlocks with a projection of the rear section, and the projections interlock with grooves in the side plates. The L-shaped front section and the L-shaped rear section are formed through a press working operation. The U-shaped structure of the slide rail body can be viewed as two rectangular parallelograms with a rectangular diagonal line thereof. That is, one side of each rectangular parallelogram is a line extending between a middle point of the projection and a bottom of the groove of the side plate. If the slide rail body of the conventional slide rail is to be shortened in a transverse direction, for example, to make it suitable for a small drawer box, it is necessary to make a groove width narrow. However, such a narrow groove leads to a poor surface strength. That is, the front section of the conventional slide rail body is formed with an injection molded process and the groove has a simple cross section. Therefore, it is difficult to provide a sufficient surface strength to the groove. The invention provides a slide rail and a drawer with a compact structure. According to one aspect of the present invention, a slide rail includes a first slide rail body and a second slide rail body. The first slide rail body has a substantially U
